While teaching and lecturing in this part of his country the Auvergne region Bergson found time for private study and original work. In a piece written for Slate and published in April Adieu François l'entrepreneur sen va (French Edition) Newman noted the similarities in the career trajectories between the two men - "Both grew their fortunes on allegedly mafia-linked real-estate developments, transitioned into successful careers as media moguls, and, against all odds, ascended to the helm of their respective national governments" - but also highlighted their shared tendency to question and undermine established institutions such as the judiciary and the press, the way that neither of them had been accepted by their countries' respective establishments despite their wealth, and how they channelled the resulting resentment into a populist form of politics by "portraying themselves as everymen, if not in wealth, then in language, tone and aspirations". Washington expressed the urgency of the situation, proclaiming: Archived from the original on 27 September

Like Bergson's, his writings were placed on the Index by the Vatican. Throughout the s, Trintignant starred in numerous films, and in he made his first English language feature film, Under Fire.
